Walking in Windhoek

Walking aimlessly in the Central Business District on a public holiday reveals your identity as a foreigner. On such a day only very few cars are driving on the long and wide Independence Avenue in downtown Windhoek. If at all people venture out on a Sunday, they go to church or enjoy a meal in one of the restaurants. Apparently, strolling around on the empty streets on weekends is not something the locals enjoy. It is too hot, distances are too long, banks and most shops are closed - and there seems to be nothing special to see in the Central Business District with one exception: the Central Business District itself - when it is not busy.

On such a day the accidental tourist and his camera have the city to themselves. No passersby disturb the photographer or spoil the photo: Street photography in its strictest sense. Light and shadow show the forms of architecture and urban structures. But this is not a mere document of stones and streets, as Windhoek is a city where even the street signs and names reveal history. At some places sunbeams and colours spin small stories in our minds. And many of the photos show a seemingly deserted city under a blue sky, which may create the strange sensation in the beholder to be the only survivor. But it is only a lazy Sunday afternoon - and a playground for a man with his camera.
